The Netbios Share Scanner is a special tool that uses active-directory for authentication. It uses the Netbios protocol to check if the local machine has any shares that are accessible. You can scan one or many machines at once using it. It will also show you if the shares are in the open state or locked (this means that the contents are private and can not be viewed by other users of the same computer.) The Netbios Share Scanner will show you all the information of all the shares that are accessible. It shows you the name of the share, what OS and version it is running on. It will also show you what type of shares are the shares. It will show you all the settings of the share that can be modified. It will show you all the users and groups that have access to the share and what rights they have to the share. If you don't want to see the content of the shares, you can turn off that option. It will also show you all the NetBios servers on the network. It will list them all in a list and you can click on them and see what other shares are in the same network. It will list the Windows domain and workgroup name of the Netbios servers in the network. It will show you the IP address of the Netbios server. It will also show you the IP address of the local Netbios server that is using NetBIOS to access the other machines. It will also list all the shares that are set to be open.
