GOOGLE CERTIFIED EDUCATOR LEVEL 1.Q: Allow users to browse multiple directories in Win 7 (Windows Explorer) I have an embedded device running Win 7. It has an interface that allows the user to input a url and choose a directory. It then downloads content from that url into a local directory, then fires up a web-browser to display that content. I have added as many directories as I can think of to the default search path, but this causes a long list of multiple content types (image, doc, mp3, etc) to be downloaded. It would be much simpler to just have the user select a single directory (i.e. $HOME), but this doesn't work for all users. Is there a way to get this to work for every user? A: In Windows 7 they have changed the API's a bit with the new 'explorer libraries' and 'shell extensions' (that replaces the old shell32 and shell32ext dll's). That means you have to get the latest 'explorer libraries' and use the 'shell extensions' for webpages. Check out this link on MSDN.

Geraldine Griswold, Publisher at Parenting.com - Growing Kids With Pictures – Hi Parents, Do you know that photo memories are stored in the brain and not on your phone or PC. As children grow up, the number of photographs they create and store on their devices, grows exponentially, putting their memories on multiple devices at the same time. With Dr.Fone, you can organize these memories by photo date, type, locations, and who took the photo. Dr.Fone makes it easy to “find the one”. Our Solution - Dr. Fone gives you easy access to the memories and organizes them by date, location, and type. Download Dr. Fone – 1.65 MB File – Updated today.
